

TOR BRIGHT SPRING DAYS.

The New Stuffs and the New Ways of Combining Them—Characteristics of the House Gown—Some Gowns That Will Not Go to Chicago.

[COPYRIGHT, 1893.]

Some women do not care what sort of a gown they wear, so long as all is spick and span beneath its hem. Their lingerie must be the pink of perfection, and for more than that they do not care; the dress over may be old-fashioned or threadbare; they are perfectly indifferent to outward appearance so long as they rest serene in the consciousness that, in very fact, they are daintily elad. Then there's the other sort of woman, the one that doesn't care how she looks on the street so long as she is attractive at home. She will throw any sort of old gar-ment about her when she goes out, and rush through her shopping or other business, regardless of the crowd, and then go home to fix and primp for hours, in order to look pretty and homelike. These are the charming home women that make such pretty pictures in great chairs, with graceful grammats suggestive, of the Grade garments suggestive of the Greek. These are the women that devote much These are the women that devote much thought to the tea and house gown; and it is these that are specially delighted with the pretty gowns of today. The tea gowns have smocked or shirred or gathered yokes; they have loose empire belts; they have lace eponds the same that the local transfer of the same that th shirred or gathered yokes; they have loose empire belts; they have lace one, and above in the small velvet one of purple. Then the waist is enable the soft silks, all the pretty crepons and all the crinkly silks; they have all the dainty colors, and all the pretty that they have sould believe the soft silks. sauntered along the other afternoon in the bright sunshine. There was the big pattern of dull green palm leaves isomee and the green were cut away scattered over. There were three minute black net ruffles on her skirt, each The evening bodice is fast becoming her bodice were fastened on jacket shape, and at the front, where the material was gathered into full folds, was a fall of ashes-of-rose chiffon. She

The woman in the brocade, however, won the day. She obtained all the stares, all the turnings around, all the "Just looks!" all the "See theres!"

You'd think her dress was so heavy that she wouldn't be able to walk beneath the load. But that's the beauty of the material; it looks so thick and rich and old-fashioned, and it is really just as light as a feather. You'd think it was genuine old brocade, but when you touch it you find it is satin thread wrought on fine gauze, raised in such fashion as to look like heavy embroid-ery. But there's nothing beneath the ridges, and there's nothing to give it comfortable even on a very warm day. All the latest stuffs are particularly thin. You can look through almost every one of them. Most of them are eastern in appearance and are very fascinating with the tiny silk spots or threads run all over, making such quaint designs. They are a little expensive, to be sure. Six dollars a yard is the price of that deceptive brocade, but what would you?

You can get such wonderful effects from these beautiful, changing materials, that you are more than compensated for their cost. Of pale yellow, shading into dull heliotrope, you can make a plaited skirt—the plaits rather more than ever for locomotion upon the close over the hips, but falling widely big toe.

apart at the feet, and just caught there with velvet heliotrope loops. You can have a fancy yoke of gold embroidery or braiding, at the neck, cut away in front in a small square. You can have gold fringe langing from the yoke, almost hiding the square of the almost hiding the three velvet bands of heliotrope that run around the short bodice. Lastly, you can have deep white lace ruffles on your shoulders, over the plain sleeves that are all striped with dark velvet.

Not all the dresses that are under way now are going to the world's fair. way now are going to the world's lair. Some are far too dainty for that great rush, and they will stay at home. Faney a dainty white silk, rayed with pale pink and dotted with tiny dark gray speeks, walking among those great throngs. The poor thing would be crowded out of existence. The two little ruffles at the bottom, edged with peach velvet, would, be torn and be-draggled. The small double bretelles would lose all their airiness, and the white guipare of the bodice wouldn't be white very long. The pretty jet that catches the bretelles in front, and the pendants thereof, would be torn away very quickly; and the lovely peach of the velvet belt and the small capote would not survive long under the dust and dirt of the Chicago streets. Ah, no! my lady leaves that dress at home; she will air it before she leaves for the fair.

The heliotrope fad is still with us. A new edition of it made its appearance in a skirt of two divisions, each division armed with three ruffles. The ruffle appearance is, of course, carried out on shoulders as well, in, first, a deep white

It was so very bright out that every woman that could get there was in the brilliant crowd that sauntered along the other afternoon in the bright supplies. She wore a small, flat sailor hat of rough straw, old rose, with a few rosettes of green fancy silk net, and a few prefixed from the control of here or fall from there. They're much prettier than any proper bodice, however, made with careful precision; and the maiden that wears one of them, Right ont of a candy shop walked forth, brazen as you please, Miss Shirt-Frent, with neat, plain skirt, of the velvet-ruffle variety, and with pale pink shirt, stiff, highly polished, showing at the sides also, hiding itself farther back under the small Bolero jacket of brown velvet. The soft crush velvet belt coming up over looked rather queer beside the hard surface of the shirt.

the maiden that wears one of them, dresses her hair in high fashion and puts some aigrettes or other ornaments in it, makes as pretty a picture as one could dresses her hair in high fashion and puts some aigrettes or other ornaments in it, waists for ordinary wear, made of wash silk in light stripes. These are most convenient, and very cool for shopping or any occupation requiring enormous rush and exertion.

The performance given by the strolling players in the small town was really so bad that the few people who had seen it organized a fence-rail party and went after the manager. They had him out in no time, though he fought like a Moslem.
"By thunder," he puffed, "I can lick any man in the crowd. You are a pack of cowards and are afraid to give me half a show "

"Shut up!" said the spokesman; "if you'd been afraid to have treated us that way, it might have been better for any weight. Such material would be you," and the manager was hoisted on to the rail and the procession proceeded. -Detroit Free Press.
